

Do Your Research! Part 1

Behavioral Health is Unique – its Practice Management is too!

All EHRs are not created equal – and this is especially true of mental health EHRs! Unfortunately, behavioral health seems to be the red-headed stepchild of the EMR world.

Mental health providers are notoriously resistant to migrate to an electronic system; and once they are ready to make the change, there are a ton of systems to weed through.

With the advent of Meaningful Use, a lot of programs were slapped together in the past six to seven years, to try and capture the federal incentive funds. Sadly, many of these systems don't support the daily reality of the clinicians using them: they're cumbersome at best; and mental health functionality is often an afterthought, if considered at all.

The need for efficiency, easy integration among departments, data security, and especially mental-health specific features were often sacrificed in the rush to create many programs.
